Overview

The NLA is introducing a new licence for businesses who receive newspaper website content (including links to newspaper websites) via their paid for media monitoring service.

End user organisations will need to be licensed by January 2010, including those who forward and/or receive links from monitoring agencies systematically.

Existing NLA licensees will be able to extend their current licence to include web content at the time of their renewal.

For a list of all the newspaper websites involved in the scheme, please go to:

http://www.nla-web.co.uk/media_monitoring_clients.aspx

Please note News International titles and FT.com are not involved in this scheme.

Rules for sending and receiving newspaper website links:

A web licence is not needed if your organisation:

- Makes personal links to website pages for reference
- Sends links for non-commercial purposes. Sending a link to a colleague / friend is usually fine, as is putting a link to an article on an intranet or website

A web licence is needed if your organisation:

- Regularly sends links as part of paid work – either to a client or internally
- Makes copies of newspaper website content (e.g. multiple prints, PDFs, etc)
- Makes copies of newspaper website content in the course of wider activity (for example building a commercial computer index), even if the content was not sent to a third party

Licensing Options:

There are two licensing tariffs available for clients who receive content from newspaper websites via a media monitoring organisation:

Variable Tariff: This is based on the total volume of estimated links in a year.

Fixed Tariff: This is based on the number of permitted users of an electronic service and the organisation's headcount.

Variable Tariff:

To estimate the volume of links supplied in a year the NLA uses the following formula:

Fixed Tariff:

The fee for the Fixed Tariff is based on the number of recipients of an electronic service and the organisation's headcount, using the below table:
